Ethical considerations

Population differences should be considered when comparing districts. A district may have more medication dispensing simply because more people live there. Therefore, a higher number of dispensings should not automatically be interpreted as that district having more health problems.

Medication dispensing does not necessarily mean medication use. The data show that medicines were dispensed, but they do not tell us whether patients actually took the medicines. Therefore, we should be careful about making conclusions about people's actual medication use from dispensing data alone.

Privacy considerations

Very small groups should not be highlighted unnecessarily. When medication, location, year and population information are combined, some groups can become very small. We should avoid presenting very detailed information about these small groups because this could increase privacy risks.

Only the information needed for the project should be used and shared. We should avoid sharing unnecessary detailed data in graphs, tables, the dashboard, or other project files. The final results should contain only the information needed to answer our research question.
